Playing "Mother Nature?"

Fore years' there have been arguments about how much scientists should tamper with lifes basic natural forces. In the novel Frankenstein she explores the idea of a scientist. Which creates a life within dead organic tissue. Mary Shelley's book goes on to tell the story of the disasterous results of this project, many people would agree that nature is not for we humans to mess with. However some scientists whom disagree claim that human progress requires experimentation. Its unlikely of coarse that their going to re-create the story of Frankenstein but how can we be sure that the affects of they're experimentation won't be just as disasterous? Thru there literary works, authors like Mary Shelley try and get us to think about this and other issues.
